

A day in the life: Research and Development (R&D) Tax

Connor Slaven, Associate

The best part of my day is working with various types of clients, from healthcare professionals to software developers and ultimately helping their business grow through the use of R&D schemes.

In the R&D team, we help innovative companies - including start-ups and high growth companies - through the claim process, conducting technical calls, in-person on-site meetings and ensuring a smooth process for the client. This is achieved by ensuring my technical knowledge is high and communicating the available reliefs with them effectively.

My day to day tasks change from client to client. As our clients work on different year ends, some may be in the preparation stage with others close to finalisation and submission. My day can range from drafting technical R&D reports, focusing on the clients work during the period as well as preparing the financial side of their R&D claim. I also work with other departments within the Company to ensure that the claim is finalised and submitted correctly.

Working in the R&D field has been great in further developing my tax knowledge across the wider industry.
